Rural Development Professionals (RDPs) are key actors in processes of social change for people living with HIV/AIDS in rural areas. This article reports on the filming of a series of workshops and courses for RDPs in Ghana, India, Tanzania and Zambia. Analyzing the production and consumption processes shows the interconnectedness of the filming and learning during the courses. The results indicate that the films contribute to improved rural development professionalism in the context of HIV/AIDS.

This article describes the achievements, challenges, and lessons emerging from the Parliamentarians for Women's Health (PWH) project. This ground-breaking pilot project has been implemented in Southern and East Africa. It attempted to support a different expression, or redefinition, of leadership - at the level of both parliamentarians and community members. It did this through facilitating dialogue and the exchange of information, views and analysis between MPs, civil-society organisations, HIV-positive women's networks, and community members.

Although the size of the economy in terms of total household income is reduced by about 6 per cent after 15 years, average household income per capita, household income inequality and poverty remain almost unchanged. In contrast to an often heard argument, the population dependency ratio is not much modified by the AIDS epidemic. These conclusions do not seem to depend on the degree of heterogeneity and clustering of HIV/AIDS infections over the population.

The concept of a microbicide appears simple, but developing anti-HIV microbicides is difficult. Because microbicides are a new class of products, there are several unknown parameters that challenge the identification and development of a successful biocide. Just as with the vaccine trials, there have been a number of unsuccessful microbicide clinical trials. Yet there remains great hope, supported by sound science, that microbicides can be developed that are safe, easy to use, and highly effective in preventing the sexual transmission of HIV.

Drawing on a twenty-year study, the authors examine the effects of HIV-related illness and death on villagers in Malawi during 2006. Contrary to unidimensional images of an AIDS disaster, they found people striving for normality - trying to control the abnormal circumstances of the rising toll of HIV-related illness and death. Just over 40 per cent of the sample households had experienced at least one death (certainly or probably) related to HIV, but only about 10 per cent were found to be suffering acute or serious livelihood stress due to HIV deaths.

The probability of HIV being transmitted from mother to child during pregnancy and delivery can be as high as 25 %. If an HIV-positive woman breastfeeds her baby, the risk rises to 40 %. Around 370,000 children a year are infected with HIV - most of them in Sub-Saharan Africa - and usually by their mother. Yet if proper action is taken, the risk of infection can be radically reduced.

An under-researched facet of HIV/AIDS is the effect it had on the public administration in Botswana. Whereas classical approaches to public administration suggest that it is civil service organisations that lead in health administration, HIV/AIDS spawned a particular type of organisation, the policy network. In mitigating HIV/AIDS, the policy environment became more fragmented with networks for treatment, prevention, advocacy and research emerging.

In 2001, the Thai government adopted the policy to scale-up its treatment initiative to meet the needs of all its people. This study examines the processes by which the universal antiretroviral therapy (ART) policy developed between 2001 and 2007, with the focus on the connections between actors who shared common interests - so-called policy networks. Research findings illustrate the crucial contributions of non-state networks in the policy process.

In: Bulletin of the World Health Organization. Geneva. 86 (2008) 7. S.559-567

Aufsatz

Entwicklungsländer/ AIDS + Arzneimittel + Gesundheit, Programm

The paper analyses the early loss of patients to antiretroviral therapy (ART) programmes in resource-limited settings. Using data on 5491 adult patients starting ART (median age 35 years, 46 percent female) in 15 treatment programmes in Africa, Asia and South America with 12 months of follow-up, the authors investigated risk factors for no follow-up after treatment initiation, and loss to follow-up or death in the first 6 months.

Early patient losses were increasingly common when programmes were scaled up and were associated with a fee for service and advanced immunodeficiency at baseline. Measures to maximize ART programme retention are required in resource-poor countries.

The release of the new WHO guidelines on HIV and infant feeding, in a global context of widespread impoverishment, requires countries to re-examine their infant-feeding policies in relation to broader socioeconomic issues. Providing formula to poor populations with high HIV prevalence cannot be justified by the evidence, by humanitarian considerations, by respect for local traditions or by economic outcomes. Exclusive breastfeeding, which is threatened by the HIV epidemic, remains an unflinching anchor of child survival.

The project is likely to have powerful long-term effects through strengthening of capacity and establishment of systems for the national programme.

This article draws on recent research by Gender Action, presented in a ground-breaking report investigating multilateral development banks' (MDBs) spending on reproductive health and HIV and AIDS. Gender Action demonstrates a decline in World Bank loans and grants for reproductive health and HIV and AIDS, and little contribution to this sector from the African Development Bank, Asian Development Bank, or Inter-American Development Bank. Mapping also charts unmet MDB commitments to reproductive health and HIV and AIDS, and harmful loan conditions such as restricting public spending, which undermine poor countries' ability to address these key public-health issues.

HIV and AIDS prevention efforts have relied heavily on providing information, and have sometimes provided a weak link to services, without perceiving or addressing the factors which make adolescent girls particularly vulnerable. Current work focusing on HIV and youth is failing to reach many of the most vulnerable girls. This article discusses innovative interventions in four African countries, which explicitly address the distinctive social, economic, and cultural factors that shape girls' vulnerability, and build up their health, social, and economic assets.

Expanding access to AIDS information, particularly in rural areas, while concomitantly addressing the social and structural determinants of educational attainment is crucial to improving the health of young people.

A total of 20 children with ages ranging from 10 to 14 years, attending four different primary schools located in the rural wards of Mberengwa district of Zimbabwe were involved in this study. All the children showed signs of emotional need and they were lagging behind in their academic work. Psychosocial support was provided to these children over a period of eight months resulting in improvements in several areas, including schoolwork during and after the intervention period.

The article interrogates current international development constructs of childhood, rights, vulnerability, and schooling in light of the daily experiences of two Malawian children affected by HIV/AIDS. It aims to better understand how development efforts targeted at these children function in practice, and suggests that current development discourses and frameworks may sometimes operate to make the lives of vulnerable children and communities harder and less secure. New frameworks for international HIV/AIDS development programming are needed that conceptualize the child and community as part of global educational, social, political, and economic systems that can fuel inequality as well as improve life experiences.

The main finding of this analysis is that the HIV epidemic reached a major turning point over the past decade. The peak years of HIV incidence rates are past for all regions, and the peaks of prevalence rates are mostly in the past except in Eastern Europe, where they are expected to peak in 2008. But owing in part to the life-prolonging effect of antiretroviral therapy and to sustained population growth, the absolute number of infected individuals is expected to keep growing slowly in sub-Saharan Africa and to remain near current levels worldwide, thus posing a continuing challenge to public health programs.

Lower wages and higher HIV prevalence rates are strongly associated with the brain drain of physicians from Sub-Saharan African to OECD countries. In countries in which the HIV prevalence rate exceeds 3 percent, a doubling of the medical brain drain rate is associated with a 20 percent increase in adult deaths from AIDS; medical brain drain does not appear to affect life expectancy. These findings underscore the need to improve economic conditions for physicians in order to retain physicians in Sub-Saharan Africa, especially as antiretroviral treatment becomes more widely available.

They then report on experiences in one Province, Free State, over a period of 2 years. There is a significant CHW presence in the South African health system. This infrastructure, however, shares many of the managerial challenges (stability, recognition, volunteer vs. worker, relationships with professionals) associated with previous national CHW programmes. The authors discuss prospects for sustainability in the light of the new policy context.

Sexual violence is a significant problem in South Africa. Such encounters bring psychological trauma, social stigma, and the risk of pregnancy, HIV and sexually transmitted infections. Multivariate results show a significant negative relationship between non-consensual sexual experience and schooling progression amongst females.

But a decade later the hoped-for democracy dividend has largely failed to materialise. On the positive side, youth enjoy new rights and freedoms, while education is the main tangible output of democracy. But for the overwhelming majority of the youth, life is dominated by unemployment, crime and violence, and HIV/AIDS pandemic, which is scything down young people and leaving their babies to be brought up by grandmothers, creating a new generation without parents.

South Africa has a well-defined system of social security, which can be described as the largest anti-poverty instrument in the post-apartheid years. These grants are administered by the Department of Social Development and serve as an important means of poverty alleviation in a country where poverty and unemployment are widespread, and where the rapid increase in HIV/AIDS infection is making more people more vulnerable than ever. Thus far, the number of grant beneficiaries stands at over 11 million. The only problem of the current social security system is that it does not embrace all of the poor. It is hoped that future reforms of the system will effectively address the gaps in its coverage.

Brazil has adopted a radical approach toward combating its AIDS epidemic in the last decade. Not only has it taken a number of preventative measures, but it has adopted the philosophy that a struggle against the disease must also be a fight to save its victims for as long as the most modern technology will allow. Antiretroviral medicines used to extend the lives of HIV-infected people also have the side effect of decreasing transmission rates; thus in the macro view, post-infection treatment is itself a significant form of prevention.

HIV threatens the survival of many civil-society organisations (CSOs) in Africa. This article highlights important findings from exploratory research in Malawi. Respondents perceived that overall performance in the four CSOs studied declined by an average 20 per cent because they were working in a context of high HIV prevalence. Yet the CSOs' workplace response to this threat was very limited, and they remain highly vulnerable to future impact. The authors consider why the CSOs have not been more proactive, and recommend that donor policy should

The research reveals that fish-for-sex is not an anecdotal phenomenon but a practice increasingly reported in many different developing countries, with the largest number of cases observed in Sub-Saharan African inland fisheries. An overview of the main narratives that attempt to explain the occurrence of FFS practices is presented, along with other discourses and preconceptions, and their limits discussed. The analysis outlines the many different and complex dimensions of fish-for-sex transactions. The paper concludes with a set of recommendations.

AIDS-affected households in rural Africa often turn to natural resources as a livelihood safety net. Yet women affected by AIDS have less time for sound resource management, and indigenous knowledge is lost when parents die before educating their children. As demand and inappropriate use grow, resource depletion and land degradation increase. In many countries, widows cannot inherit land. As poverty deepens in the wake of AIDS, women and girls are often forced into prostitution, accelerating the spread of HIV. Multi-sectoral approaches by development, health, and environmental organisations can reduce the impact of HIV and AIDS on women, rural communities, and the natural environment.

AIDS policy in post-apartheid South Africa has been shaped by persistent antipathy towards antiretroviral drugs (ARVs). This hostility was framed initially by President Mbeki's questioning of AIDS science and subsequently by direct resistance to implementing prevention and treatment programmes using ARVs. Once that battle was lost in the courts and in the political arena, the Health Minister, Tshabalala-Msimang, continued to portray ARVs as 'poison' and to support alternative untested therapies. AIDS policy improved after the Deputy President was given responsibility for coordinating AIDS policy in 2006. However, the undermining of the scientific governance of medicine is a legacy that still needs to be addressed.

The authors take advantage of successive rounds of Demographic Health Surveys from a number of African countries to examine recent changes in risk behaviours in Africa. For Benin, Burkina Faso, Ghana, Kenya, Mozambique, Nigeria, Uganda and Zambia, surveys are available from two points in time that include comparable questions on the following HIV-risk relate behaviours: The age at first intercourse, whether the individual is sexually active and the number of his or her current sexual partners, and the use of condoms at last intercourse.

The connection between individual wealth and HIV/AIDS has long been of interest to researchers and policy makers. In this article, the author investigates various mechanisms through which economic status is associated with sexual risk behaviour, as measured by the non-use of condoms within sexual partnerships, to shed light on the role that wealthy men play in spreading infection in a high HIV/AIDS environment.

The author observed numerous classes that focused on HIV/AIDS and interviewed approximately 40 undergraduate, honours (4th year), and graduate students. The curriculum and teaching went beyond the technical, individualistic, rational, self-interested assumptions and approaches (such as how to distribute information and condoms) typical of much safe-sex education. The courses explicitly critiqued assumptions, beliefs, and stereotypes that contribute to social divisions and stigma.

The teaching efforts consciously included cultural understandings, specifically Zulu cultural understandings of health, community responses, and individuals within communal relationships.

The article looks at the International AIDS Vaccine Initiative (IAVI) and the way in which more grassroots participation is linked to communications strategy in the IAVI's case. It argues that examining the extent to which participation efforts are embedded in broader communication strategies may be important in distinguishing between ways in which participation is deployed and used and distinguishes between 'communication for participation' and 'participation for communication'. The article also explores Hirschman's ideas around 'exit', 'voice' and 'loyalty' and innovation systems as frameworks, which help to situate participation in the broader context of institutional development.

In sub-Saharan Africa teachers are increasingly asked to deliver HIV/AIDS education and act as counsellors to orphaned and vulnerable children. In addition to his traditional role, the school teacher must now be able to offer preventive education, care and support to students affected by the epidemic. This paper presents five dimensions related to teacher professionalism to provide a conceptual basis for rethinking the actions and activities teachers undertake in countries with high HIV-prevalence.

China VR/ Sexualität + Verhalten + AIDS

This article uses data from the first national probability survey of adult sexual behaviour in China completed during 1999-2000, along with a historical and literature review, to address three key questions: (1) Has there been a revolution in sexual behaviour in China? (2) Is China unique compared to other countries in these transformations? (3) What are the implications of these findings for China's risk of a generalized HIV epidemic?

The emergence of the HIV/AIDS pandemic has added to the tension between patients' private interests and public health interests regarding medical confidentiality. Many people become infected with HIV because they are unaware of the positive serostatus of their sexual partners. The question of whether doctors should be legally empowered to breach the confidence of patients to protect the patients' sexual partners is discussed here with reference to the existing laws of Canada, the United States, and Nigeria.

This article summarizes some important arguments for and against instituting a routine testing regimen for HIV/AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa. After reviewing these competing positions and noting their areas of agreement and disagreement, the author recommends an alternative way to solve the main sticking point between them, that is, how to test a large majority of the population while still respecting their human rights to autonomy and freedom from unnecessary harm. This article argues that the proposed solution would respect the rights to autonomy of the individual to a sufficient degree and stands a greater chance of being both practicable and effective than the alternatives.

Afrika südlich der Sahara/ AIDS + Gesundheitserziehung + Beratung + Ethik

Given the severity of the AIDS pandemic in sub-Saharan Africa, the potential societal benefit of testing is invoked to call for its massive expansion and to justify a shift from voluntary to routine testing. Surprisingly little evidence has demonstrated, however, that such a shift will result in the intended benefits to communities, particularly that of reducing the horizontal transmission of HIV. This analysis addresses and critiques the assumptions underlying a serostatus-based approach to behaviour change and discusses the ethical consequences of transferring control of the decision to be tested from the individual to the provider.

Over the last decade evidence has emerged suggesting that in many countries fisherfolk, as an occupational group, are at greater risk to HIV and AIDS than the general adult population. This high vulnerability has been explained in terms of the lifestyles associated with fishing and related occupations. This article looks at the lives of some men, women, and children living in a lake-side community in Uganda severely affected by HIV and AIDS to illustrate how existing portrayals of fisherfolk, and fishing communities, need to avoid stereotypes in order to better inform appropriate health sector and livelihood support measures.

The Multi-Country AIDS Program (MAP) is a World Bank commitment of 1 billion dollars to fight HIV/AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa. The main aim of the MAP, launched in 2000, was to bring about a major scaling up of the multisectoral response to HIV/AIDS. Multisectorality referred to the involvement of community-based organizations, nongovernmental organizations, line ministries and the highest level of state government in shaping and leading the response to HIV/AIDS. This article aims to demonstrate how the MAP has failed and why.
